Now the Cougars are forced to look elsewhere for some offensive firepower. For the time being, there is no definite plan on how to replace Mahe, French said.

"Other players have to rise to the occasion," said French. "They'll have to play bigger, better and harder." French said that nobody can fill in directly for Mahe, but other players like Rob Morris will have to step it up a notch.

Whatever the plan, it won't be an easy task to replace Mahe.

"I don't think you can replace Junior with one guy," Chow said. "We'll have to use the strengths of a couple of different guys."

But Mahe isn't entirely written off just yet. There is still a chance that he could be running the ball for the Cougars in the future. Carri Jenkins said Mahe could "reapply to the university just as any other student." She said that if Mahe was readmitted, he could opt to redshirt this season and still have three years of playing eligibility left at BYU.

Which option Mahe will take is still up in the air. Right now he has other things on his mind. Mahe is currently mourning the deaths of two loved ones: his uncle passed away last week and, on Saturday, his high school coach was killed in a car accident driving home from Lake Powell.

According to Chow, the coaching staff plans to talk with Mahe about his future at BYU after he has dealt with these other personal issues.

Fehlberg steps down as athletics director at Y

After four years as BYU's director of men's athletics, Rondo Fehlberg announced that he is resigning from his position at the university in a press conference Friday.

"The past four years at BYU have been a marvelous experience for me and my family," Fehlberg said. "It has been my privilege to be associated with truly wonderful faculty, administrators and student athletes."

Val Hale, associate athletic director for external affairs, will be Fehlberg's replacement. BYU head baseball coach Gary Pullins will take over the position of assistant athletic director.

"(Hale's) extensive experience in leadership roles ... along with his excellent marketing and communication skills, make him exceptionally well qualified for his new responsibilities," BYU President Merrill J. Bateman said. Fehlberg also supported the choice for his replacement.

"I am confident that Val Hale will continue BYU's strong tradition of leadership and excellence in intercollegiate athletics," he said.

President Bateman praised Fehlberg's efforts during his four-year tenure at BYU.

"We are especially appreciative of his skillful and successful negotiations on BYU's behalf in connection with bowl games, television contracts and the formation of the new Mountain West Conference," he said.

Under Fehlberg, BYU won the 1996 Cotton Bowl, the university's first-ever New Year's Day bowl game, and the men's volleyball 1999 national championship. Fehlberg also helped establish the Varsity Club, an organization of former BYU athletes.

Hale, a 17-year veteran of BYU's athletic department, thanked Fehlberg and others for his experience.

"I have had the privilege of observing some of the best athletic administrators in the business," he said. "I am humbled, yet excited, by the challenge of leading such a talented group of coaches, administrators and student athletes as we carry on the great tradition of BYU athletics."

The change will take effect July 1.

'Not a penny'

Clinton: U.S. money not to aid damaged infrastructure

Associated Press

BONN, Germany — President Clinton Monday firmly rejected spending U.S. dollars to help Yugoslavia rebuild bridges and roads damaged during the NATO air campaign. "Not a bit, not a penny," he said.

Speaking during a closing news conference for a U.S.-European Union summit, Clinton said the United States would help with humanitarian aid, such as repairing hospitals and even power plants to restore electricity to the Serb population.

"Their hospitals should be able to function. Babies will be born, people will be sick," Clinton said. But he said rebuilding infrastructure such as bridges and roads would constitute economic assistance that shouldn't be extended while Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic is in power.

"I don't think we should help, not a bit, not a penny," Clinton said. "That basically is where I draw the line."

The attacks destroyed dozens of bridges and rail links across the country, disrupting major transport routes and connections between the northern food-producing regions and large cities further south. The airstrikes also have forced commercial river traffic along the Danube to be suspended.

Clinton spoke after meeting with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, who is serving as chairman of the 15-nation European Union. The two leaders committed to developing a Balkan recovery plan and agreed to hold a conference in Sarajevo next month of nations donating to the rebuilding.

"In having it there, we want to send a clear signal that the region can very much rely on the fact that we are not just talking about providing assistance, but we really want to help and will help," Schroeder said.

Later, White House spokesman Joe Lockhart said the conference might not be held until August or September. He also said Sarajevo might not be the site. "Some work has to be done to see if it can actually happen there," he said.

Residents berate Provo program

By PAUL HATCH

A program designed to increase communication between Provo's neighborhoods and the City Council is under fire by some of its participants.

The city's Neighborhood Program, which directed by the City Council, divides the city into 34 neighborhoods with an elected chair representing each neighborhood's views to the City Council.

But Shari Holweg, a member of the City Council, said the system has strayed from its original purpose.

"Right now I see the power of politics having manipulated the program into something it was never meant to be," said Holweg. "They've perverted the process."

Holweg said the chairs deal mostly with zoning and planning issues that affect their areas. She said she is concerned that some chairs are not giving true representations of their neighborhoods.

"The problem is that certain chairs, rather than representing their neighborhood, brought their own opinions to the microphone," Holweg said.

Additionally, she said some chairs have been used by outside individuals to promote their own agendas. She gave an example of a developer using a chair to persuade his or her neighborhood to accept the developer's desires.

"That is absolutely not what the program was intended to do," she said. "They should be questioning the city, making sure the city is doing everything it can and at all times representing the view of the neighborhood."

Holweg said the program must make a change or it will lose its credibility as a legitimate organization.

But City Councilor Dennis Poulsen said misrepresentation rarely happens in the neighborhood program. He said the program is successful in making the neighborhoods' opinions known.

"It's one of those things that makes Provo what it is," he said. "How can it be negative when you get citizen involvement?"

Poulsen is the head of the committee that directs the program. He said most chairs do get involved, especially Power was knocked out to most Provo homes and businesses Monday after lightning started a fire at the mouth of Provo Canyon, burning a wire and debilitating two power substations.

A call was made from 5490 N. Canyon Road, an address adjacent to the burn site, at 1:33 p.m. Thirty firefighters from four agencies — Provo City, Orem City, Utah County and the National Forest Service — arrived at the fire at 1:47 p.m.

"The fact that those people were there so fast was what made it possible to keep this fire under control. This could have been a very significant fire," said Lynn Scholfield, Provo City Fire Department spokesman.

The fire burned an estimated five acres. No structures or people were harmed, but an electrical wire at the site was burned, which shut down the substation across the street from the fire.

"The fire burned a wire, which started a cascading effect," said Ron Rydman, customer operations manager for Provo City Power.

> "The fire burned a wire, which started a cascading effect."

> —Ron Rydman, Provo City Power

Two main stations, Gillespie and Tanner, distribute electrical power to 24 other substations in Provo. The fire knocked out a crucial wire at Gillespie station at the mouth of Provo Canyon, which caused malfunctioning at Tanner and shut off power to most of the city for an hour and ten minutes starting at 1:30 p.m.

Power was rerouted to other stations, but electrical workers were still having problems with the Tanner station near Ironton, which caused a second, shorter blackout. Area fire officials said this blaze highlights the need for greater caution in the summer months.

Schofield said Utah Valley has seen comparatively few fires in the past few years, which means open spaces have more grass, bushes and dead plant matter, increasing the potential for a serious fire.

"We need to do something about fireworks in the next few weeks. This was a relatively light fire, but this summer we'll have a high fire danger because of the amount of the fuel load," Schofield said.

"Due to the very wet spring followed by the dry spell, the grass has turned dry very quickly. We need to be mindful of that," Sgt. Tom Wroe of the Utah County Strike Team said.

LDS temple to be built in Nebraska

OMAHA, Neb. — The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints plans to build a temple here — the first between St. Louis and Denver, church leaders announced Sunday.

Leaders of the LDS Church said the $4 million to $5 million project should accommodate growing church membership and recognize the city's role in the church's history.

Pending city approval, the temple will be built on 1.9 acres of land adjoining the historic Mormon Pioneer Cemetery. The area is known as Winter Quarters because LDS Church members camped there in 1846 after fleeing from religious persecution in Illinois. When Brigham Young led a party to Salt Lake City, Omaha became a staging area for the Mormon migration.

The two-story building will have a white marble exterior and a 47-foot spire topped by the customary gold-leafed statue of the angel Moroni.

No start date for construction was announced.

Mexico rocked by another quake

MEXICO CITY — Office buildings swayed and workers swarmed into the streets of the capital Monday when the second earthquake in as many weeks hit Mexico.

There were no immediate reports of damage or injuries from Monday's quake, whose epicenter was a sparsely populated mountain area 165 miles southwest of Mexico City, according to the U.S. Geological Survey in Golden, Colo.

The agency estimated the quake's magnitude at 5.7, while Mexico's National Seismological Service placed the temblor's strength at 5.8 — neither approaching the strength of the 6.7-magnitude quake that struck central Mexico on June 15.

That earthquake killed at least 17 people and injured nearly 200. It also damaged or destroyed more than 7,700 homes and numerous colonial-era churches in the states of Puebla and Oaxaca.

Radio reports from Puebla indicated the quake was felt only slightly there. There were no reports on whether any of the structures damaged in last week's quake had been weakened further by Monday's temblor.

Energy dept. give employees polygraphs

WASHINGTON — The Energy Department plans to give lie detector tests to as many as 5,000 nuclear weapons scientists and other employees in sensitive jobs with wholesale testing to begin later this summer, senior department officials said Monday.

Fifty-six counterintelligence officers, including some at the nuclear weapons laboratories, already have volunteered to take the polygraph tests, said Edward Curran, director of the DOE's Office of Counterintelligence.

Curran said in an interview Monday that by September the department will have the ability to test at the rate of more than 200 people a month. The plans call for testing about 2,500 scientists and other workers in the first year and renewed tests every five years, officials said.

It will be the first time any agency outside of the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency engaged in widespread use of polygraph tests on workers. The FBI uses the devices to screen prospective employees.

Stephen King injured; faces rehab

LEWISTON, Maine — His body is broken after being struck by a van. But his mind that created best sellers like "Carrie," "The Shining," and "Pet Sematary" is intact, Stephen King's office said Monday.

King, who was to undergo surgery Monday, faces major rehabilitation over the next year. In addition to fractures of his right leg, King suffered a broken hip, a collapsed lung and a cut on his scalp.

His office took care to note that his serious injuries were from the shoulders down.

"Mr. King's mental state is great," his office said in a statement.

The best-selling horror writer remained in serious condition at Central Maine Medical Center.

King, 51, was thrown 14 feet when he was hit from behind Saturday afternoon by a minivan as he walked along the shoulder of a road in rural Lovell, where he owns a summer home.

N., S. Korea dispute; delay talk

Associated Press

A dispute over a fertilizer shipment led North Korea to postpone talks Monday with South Korea, a South Korean official said.

North Korea put off the talks, due to have started Monday in Beijing, until it receives the last of 100,000 tons of fertilizer that the South failed to deliver by a Sunday deadline, said Yang Young-shik, the South Korean vice unification minister.

It was not clear when the talks — the highest-level meeting between the two Koreas in 14 months — would start. The delay added more uncertainty after tensions last week from a skirmish between the two Koreas' navies in a disputed part of the Yellow Sea. A North Korean gunboat was sunk and around 30 northern sailors were thought killed in one of the worst clashes in years.

North Korea late Sunday threatened retaliation for what it claimed were incursions by the South into its territorial waters.

South Korean officials said the North asked for a five-hour delay in the start of talks in a Beijing hotel Monday morning, then later brought up the issue of the shipment.

Yang said the 22,000 tons of fertilizer had been delayed because of rain and would arrive at the North Korean port of Nampo on Tuesday.

The South's delegations will stay in Beijing, he said, in hopes of meeting on Tuesday.

"It's very regrettable that they are using the fertilizer aid as an excuse to delay the talks," Yang told reporters.

North Korean officials stayed away from Monday's talks and did not comment to reporters.

Instead, the North's embassy in Beijing called a press conference to attack South Korea over the naval dispute. Embassy counselor Li Gi Pom accused South Korea of sending warships into the North's territorial waters in a "reckless provocation" in standoffs earlier this month in the Yellow Sea.

Monday's talks in Beijing, originally scheduled to last two days, were supposed to discuss aid to the stricken North and reunions lies separated since the 1950-5 an War divided the peninsula.

U.S. bombs Iraqi air defense site

ANKARA, Turkey — U.S. warplanes bombed Iraqi air defense sites Monday in response to Iraqi fire in the northern and southern no-fly zones, U.S. military officials said.

U.S. Air Force F-16s and F-15s dropped laser-guided bombs on an Iraqi command and control site north of the city of Mosul, some 250 miles north of Baghdad, the Germany-based U.S. European Command said in a statement released on the Internet.

An F-16 also attacked a surface-to-air radar site east of Mosul with anti-radiation missiles, the statement said.

In southern Iraq, U.S. Navy F-18s dropped precision-guided bombs on two Iraqi surface-to-air missile sites near As Samawah, about 150 miles south of Baghdad, military officials said.

That attack was a response to Iraq's firing of anti-aircraft artillery at allied planes patrolling the southern no-fly zone, a statement from the U.S.

Central Command at MacDill Air Force Base in Florida said.

The Iraqi army claimed that U.S. warplanes hit civilian sites in southern Iraq, wounding six people, the official Iraqi News Agency reported.

No allied aircraft were damaged in the incidents — the latest of a series of confrontations between Iraq and allied warplanes.

when an issue directly affects their neighborhood. He also said if a chair gives his or her own views, it is still representative of a large portion of the neighborhood.

But Lisa Shepherd, chair of the Lakeview South neighborhood, said the chairs need to give an accurate portrayal of their neighborhoods' feelings. She said that is one of the weaknesses of the program.

"Some representatives don't represent," she said. "A chair will have their own opinion and that's what they use."

Shepherd said the success of the program often depends on who the neighborhood chair is and how the chair views his or her position.

"Some think that it's a popularity contest," she said. "They think of themselves as the boss of the neighborhood."

Shepherd also said many neighborhood chairs don't participate and as a result hurt the program.

But she said in spite of its shortcomings, the program has been successful in many neighborhoods.

Roy Peterman, chair of the Provo Planning Commission, said the commission uses the information it receives from the neighborhood chairs when making decisions concerning the city.

"They hold public meetings and report to us what they find in the meetings, voicing pros and cons to various aspects," he said.

Peterman said he feels the program has helped residents give input for their neighborhoods.

"It's an excellent program based on a democratic process," he said.

The neighborhood chair for the Timp zone, Joyce Baggerly, also said she is pleased with the program.

"It's exactly what ought to be happening in any city," she said.

Baggerly said she hasn't seen chairs misrepresenting their neighborhoods. She said when she has a neighborhood meeting, she doesn't give her personal opinions.

"I try really hard to be objective," she said. "I say, 'Here's a problem. What do we, as a group, want to do?"

But some Provo residents said the program hasn't affected them.

Amy Andrus has lived in Provo for five years and she said she had never heard of the city's neighborhood program. She said she liked the idea but has never been contacted about her opinion.

"I'd prefer them to come knock on my door and ask me," she said. "In a sense, it's probably a good thing to get people's views

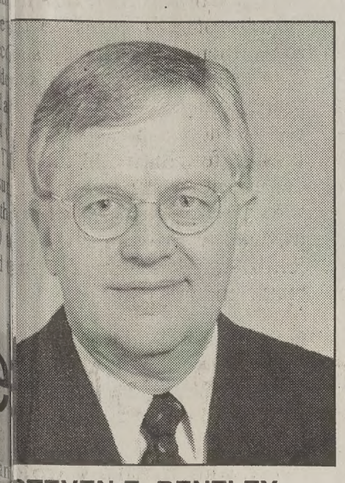
Benzley hopes to inspire magnanimity in students



STEVEN E. BENZLEY

By JENNIFER ROBINSON
jr87@e-mail.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Reporter

Steven E. Benzley will speak on "Magnifying Magnanimity" at today's Devotional at 11 a.m. in the JSB Auditorium.

Benzley will focus his remarks on the importance of applying the "powerful personal characteristic" of magnanimity to everyday life.

He cites the Savior as the primary example of magnanimous actions and includes true accounts of magnanimous acts of everday people.

Benzley, associate dean of General Education and Honors since 1996 and an instructor of an engineering ethics class, said he has found that students relate to the topic of magnanimity.

He said he hopes his Devotional address will instill this value in BYU students.

Carri Jenkins of University Communications said, "This should be an excellent Devotional. We are always uplifted when we can come together to learn from one another."

Benzley has served as associate dean of the College of Engineering and Technology and has authored more than 100 peer-reviewed articles and technical reports.

Benzley has also served as the principal investigator of more than $3.3 million in funding research projects.

Some of Benzley's students have described him as nice and always willing to help.

"He helped me, personally, find areas of funding, which I knew nothing about," said Karen Cherry, a colleague who works in the office of General Education and Honors.

Aside from his academic work in the BYU community, Benzley is active in The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and has served in numerous callings including Young Men president, elders quorum president, bishopric counselor and bishop.

"We are always uplifted when we can come together to learn from one another."

ds promote eating disorders, YU research team proves ertisements in magazines and gues try to promote sales, but same images can cause life- ning illnesses in many women, ing to a study done by a BYU ch team.

n Thomsen, professor of com- ations, Kelly McCoy, professor nily science, and Marleen ns, associate clinical professor nseling psychology, comprised that presented their findings correlation between media s and eating disorders in recently at the Fourth London ational Conference on Eating ers.

nsen said he believes the portrayed by the media can be ive. "To these young women e at risk (of eating disorders), of these beauty and fashion magazines can be as dangerous as giving a beer to an alcoholic," he said.

The researchers studied the motivations behind women's use of beauty and fashion magazines, not just the frequency with which the magazines are read. They discovered that anorexics use the media in a distorted manner.

"Understand that it's not necessarily the media's fault, but that young women may choose to use the media to support and reinforce their eating disorder," Thomsen said.

Thomsen also said that a desire to learn about popular diets from magazines coupled with a desire to have a "magazine model" appearance can increase the risk of developing anorexia.

"Reading motivations that should cause less concern include reading for entertainment purposes or out of boredom and reading to learn new trends or how to improve relations with the opposite sex," Thomsen said.

Thomsen said magazines and television programs are used by women at risk of anorexia as instruction manuals. He said articles and advertisements used to scare women away from developing eating disorders can drive women closer to the disorder.

McCoy said knowing if you or someone you know is at risk for developing eating disorders is hard to pinpoint.

"There is not one single characteristic that predicts the onset for an anorexic. All seem to come to their eating disorder from different experiences," he said.

The researchers concluded that the likelihood of eating disorders increased in certain situations.

"Many of the women we studied had to take on adult concerns at too early an age, before they had the maturity to manage them. We need to let children grow up naturally," Williams said.

"(Study Abroad) is a very efficient way to expand one's horizons and to acquire a truly global perspective within the domain of one's major or minor."
—Rodney Boynton, Study Abroad director

Other programs, though smaller, are also popular, Boynton said. Due to the interest exhibited by the BYU student body, the programs are expanded each year.

The Study Abroad program in England focuses on English authors and English history.

"I chose to go to England because I was interested in learning about literature and history," said Khirstin Hadley, 23, a senior from Laguna Niguel, Calif., majoring in communications.

The Kennedy Center has pamphlets that give a synopsis of various programs.

Students are expected to use study abroad opportunities to enhance their educational experience.

"It is important to look at your major and see which program would be most beneficial, because students are encouraged to pursue a study abroad experience that would enhance their major," said Chelita Pate, program assistant of Study Abroad.

"We offer Study Abroad as a hands-on experience. You are immersed in a language and a culture of your choice. There is not a better tool than hands-on to become an expert in your major," Pate said.

Unfortunately, cost deters some students, she said. Studying abroad is expensive with traveling costs, housing costs, food expenses and souvenir shopping added to tuition cost.

Boynton said BYU tries to make it an accessible experience by offering scholarships and loans.

Students from a wide spectrum of majors are choosing study abroad programs as the efficient way to travel, he said.

"You get to travel and experience a different culture and get credits for it. That is the best," said Virginia Carlston, 24, a humanities major from Salt Lake City.

BYU prof.'s satellite idea takes flight

By Holly Heap
holly@du2.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

BYU Professor David Long's idea for a "quick scatterometer" took off on Saturday night from the Vandenberg Air Force Base in California.

Long, BYU's electrical engineer and principle investigator for NASA, was one of five scientists chosen to speak at the launch of NASA's first QuickSCAT weather radar satellite.

The night of the launch was cold and overcast, blocking the view of more than 600 people who had commuted on 15 busses to the beach in Pasadena to watch the launch. But at 7:15 p.m., Pacific Daylight Time, the satellite was successfully deployed and is now moving toward the polar orbit. The satellite, 500 miles above the earth, will operate for three to five years, bouncing radar waves off the earth's surface to provide a measure of "surface roughness".

A clear view of the launch was seen through infra-red camera by Long's wife, children, and 18 electrical engineering students who gathered in the Crabtree building for the launch party, where they ate pizza and watched the live broadcast on select TV Saturday night.

Eight of these students have been working in close contact with NASA and Long on the QuickSCAT project for more than a year. Their research was instrumental in improving data resolution and processing of the satellite's images.

Students and Long are preparing for July 6, when the major instrument in the satellite will be turned on. Once data is received, students will check the data's reliability based on the reference tables and processing codes they created. The first images broadcast from the satellite will come from BYU, Long said.

The purpose of the satellite is to improve the long-term accuracy of weather reporting. "Over the ocean the improvement will be significant, at least a day sooner," Long said.

The National Oceanic & Atmospheric Administration will assume responsibility for incorporating the data into weather reports. Long said he believes these reports will help the overall weather forecast in Utah by the end of the summer.

Because the satellite bounces radar waves off the earth's surface rather than producing photo images of clouds like weather satellites in the past, it provides a measure of the earth's surface roughness and what is happening below the surface. Long plans to use these high-resolution radar images to study polar ice, climactic instability, and global warming.

The instrument can detect everything from the size of leaves in a rainforest to mountain ranges and can distinguish between dry snow grains and hardened glacial ice.

BYU permits wading, bicycling

By CATHERINE BROWN
catherine@du2.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

Some common summer activities, such as in-line skating, skateboarding and climbing trees, are banned on campus. However, other activities, such as bicycling and wading, are allowed within certain limits.

Lt. Greg Barber, University Police manager, said Provo City passed an ordinance, which allows the owner of private property to ban skateboarding or in-line skating by posting signs on the private property.

According to Barber, skating on campus is a civil penalty that is paid to the city. The fine is about $25 dollars, but it will rise if the fine is not paid within the allotted time, he said.

Barber said BYU is in the process of posting signs around campus that prohibit skating. He said police officers usually give warnings to people caught skating on campus. If the offenders do not stop skating, they are banned from campus. If skaters are still caught on campus after they are banned, they are then arrested for trespassing, he said.

According to Barber, although skaters are banned on campus, waders are not.

Wading in the ponds and fountains at BYU is not prohibited, unless the waders are doing more than just wading, he said.

"As far as wading in the ponds and fountains, we only get involved when they're destroying the pumps or the property or something like that," he said.

Like wading, climbing trees on campus is prohibited when damage occurs, Barber said. That becomes destruction of private property, he said.

But Roy Peterman, director of Physical Plant and Grounds at BYU, said climbing trees is not allowed on campus. He said this is a Physical Plant and Grounds policy.

"It is too dangerous and it is also sometimes harmful to the trees. Some very nice trees and specimen trees have been destroyed by people climbing in them," Peterman said.

While climbing trees is banned on campus, riding bicycles is allowed. However, bicycles must comply to the same regulation and requirements under state law that automobiles do, Barber said.

Bicyclists are occasionally pulled over and ticketed on campus streets, and riding bicycles on campus sidewalks during class breaks is also prohibited, Barber said.

Nadine Bailey, 23, a graduate student from Snohomish, Wash., majoring in microbiology, received a ticket for bicycling on campus.

Bailey said she was riding her bicycle at about 4 p.m. by the west side of the library when an officer flagged her down. Bailey said the officer then wrote her a $50 dollar ticket for riding her bicycle on campus during class breaks.

Bailey said she did not know she was violating a campus policy when she rode her bicycle during that time.

"I had no idea I could be ticketed for it. It was in the afternoon during the time when you don't know when the transitions are. It was Summer Term. There weren't that many people around," she said.

Bailey said the ticket was for $50, but she went to a bicycle safety class given by a BYU officer. Attending this three-hour class knocked her fine from $50 dollars to $10 dollars, she said.

Barber said parking bicycles outside of bicycle racks is also prohibited. Chaining bicycles to trees or banisters is banned, as is taking bicycles into campus buildings, he said.

"It just creates a mess, so the university has a policy to park them in the racks," Barber said.

Bicycles found in buildings or chained to something other than a rack will be impounded, he said.

ars — Episode 1: The Visual y" reveals that Jar Jar Binks speaks a pidgin form of Gungan dialect or Galactic Basic. According to the dictionary, few Gungans speak the pure Gungan language.

Also, the Droidekas were designed by a species of chitinous coicois in their own image on a planet far from the Republic's core.

The dictionary gives more than enough details to keep "Star Wars" film freaks busy for years discussing the names and types of fish surrounding the Otoh Gunga or the cartilaginous skeleton of the Gugans, which is stiff, but not brittle.

Mike King, 28, a senior from Woodbridge, Va, majoring in computer science, said he was told by a friend that Padme and Queen Amidala appeared on screen at the same time as themselves and each other. The dictionary proved otherwise.

"I was just curious ... I just read and found out that they were the same person ... It's just plain fun," said King.

The dictionary also contains six full pages dedicated to Queen Amidala/Padme, detailing information about the origin and purpose of each of the queen's costumes — as well as the history of the characters themselves.

Alex Moralis has not seen the new Star Wars movie yet, but the dictionary was entertaining enough to keep him busy during a lunch break.

"It is interesting because it shows parts of the movie and the props ... it's a good way to spend my break," said Moralis, a BYU Bookstore employee.

The author, Reynolds, earned his Ph.D in archaeology from the University of Michigan. Reynolds is a lecturer, veteran of field experience on three continents and author of scientific archeological publications.

Reynolds also wrote Dorling Kindersley's best selling "Star Wars: Incredible Cross-Sections," "Star Wars: The Visual Dictionary" and "Star Wars — Episode 1: Incredible Cross-Sections."

In a news release, Reynolds said he approaches "Star Wars" as if it is ancient Rome or Egypt, considering it "a culture from another time and place to explore." Reynolds currently resides in Marin County, Calif.

tate Fair' warm, funny play

Theater Review

SCERA Shell Outdoor production of "State Fair" earted and fun, but would n marginal if put on in an heater. Luckily, though, the seems to take on more life t by being presented in the l atmosphere of the heater.

l draw of the show is r itself. Families and n dates all stretched lankets, kids rolling e hills during inter- s, Rodgers and stein music floating ut the warm night these things immea- add to the warm, vn-U.S.A. of the show. .

Fair" follows an Iowa farm- ly, the Frakes, during their he 1946 Iowa State Fair. It with the parents, Able and preparing for the pig and eat competitions and the yne and Marge, trying to fig- eir love lives.

e family arrives at the fair, The Frake parents get caught up in their competitions and the Frake kids stumble into new loves. I won't give away what happens with each Frake, but it's pretty much as predictable as an episode of "Scooby Doo." From the beginning you know that the ending will be filled with blue ribbons and hasty marriage proposals.

The SCERA production of "State Fair" is unabashedly community theater. In the big production numbers, the stage is packed with 50 people, young and old, that range from noticeably seasoned dancers, to people that are doing their best to make sure that they stay in step with what everyone else was doing.

Great performances are turned in by K.C. Shaw, who plays Able Frake, Erika Frischiknecht, who plays the singer Emily Arden, and Mark Pulham, in a scene stealing turn as the tipsy fair judge. Shaw's voice and easy-going nature endears him right away to the audience. In her role Frischiknecht believably dances the line between sassy entertainer and vulnerable woman.

The story line is cheesy enough to be put on a plate and served with crackers as an hors d'oeuvre, but it is for this that it has that wholesome, happy appeal that you find in other old musicals like "The Music Man" and "Seven Brides for Seven Brothers."

With the warm summer weather and the warmth of the musical, "State Fair" is a much better alternative to sitting in a movie theater.

"State Fair" runs through June 28 at the SCERA Shell Theater located at 699 S. State in Orem. Shows start at 8 p.m. and tickets are $7 for adults and $3 for children. For more information call 225-2569.

Baseball coach gets a desk job

By ANGELLA GLENN
angella@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Sports Writer

BYU's athletic department announced Friday that men's baseball head coach Gary Pullins is stepping down as head coach and accepting a position as assistant athletic director.

The new position puts Pullins in charge of games management for BYU's men's Olympic sports. Pullins will also administer the Varsity Club, an organization for BYU's former varsity athletes.

"Leaving the coaching profession will be a different experience for me," Pullins said. "I've known other coaches who have made the transition smoothly, and I am confident I have the tools to be a good administrator. I am excited to work with the many outstanding former BYU athletes."

Pullins' move came after BYU Athletic Director Rondo Fehlberg announced his resignation Friday. Assistant director Val Hale accepted the position to replace Fehlberg, leaving Hale's position open for Pullins.

Hale said Pullins' enthusiasm will benefit the new administration.

"Gary has great interpersonal skills," he said. "I think he'll be able to work well with the previous athletes and be an asset to the athletic department as an administrator."

Fehlberg was also optimistic about Pullins' ability in the athletic department administration.

"We are confident that, in Coach Pullins' new capacity, we will continue to benefit from his love of baseball and of BYU for many years to come," Fehlberg said. "Those who know Gary are aware the he has many unique talents which will serve him well in this new position."

> "I look forward to contributing to the success of our athletic program in general and our baseball team specifically."
> — Gary Pullins, New BYU assistant AD

Pullins' new position will allow him to work with the baseball program and contribute his talents to other areas as well.

"I look forward to contributing to the success of our athletic program in general and our baseball team specifically," he said.

In 23 seasons with Cougar baseball, Pullins amassed a 913-462-6 (.663) record, ranking 16th among active NCAA Division I baseball coaches. He won seven WAC titles and 15 division crowns. In 1983 his team ranked first in the nation entering the NCAA tournament. His teams made the NCAA tournament nine other times.

Pullins will start his administrative duties July 1. A search for his replacement has already begun. In the interim, Pullins and pitching coach Bob Noel will retain their current responsibilities until a new coaching staff is in place.

Knicks avoid 3-0 hole, win at hom

Associated Press

New York led 65-62 entering the fourth, and the lead grew to seven in the first minute as Sprewell scored on a difficult drive and Camby had a thunderous dunk off an offensive rebound for his first points of the game.

A jumper by Houston gave the Knicks a 10-point lead with 6:31 left, and the score was 80-71 with the clock ticking toward four minutes before the Spurs' final push.

A three-point play by Robinson and a 3-pointer by Sean Elliott made it 81-77 with 3:13 left, but the threat ended quickly as Houston hit a 20-footer, Mario Elie missed a 3-pointer and Camby converted a short jumper to give the Knicks an 85-77 lead.

The Spurs had only one basket the rest of the way.

The Knicks played just about as well as they can in the first 12 minutes, not getting much of a lift from Camby but benefitting from two personal fouls each against Elie and Jaren Jackson, and technicals against Elie and coach Gregg Popovich.

The technical against Popovich came after the referees waved off a 3-pointer that would have cut New York's lead to 22-15. Instead, the Knicks steadily increased their lead to as many as 14, 32-18 on a 3-pointer by Chris Childs with 8 seconds left in the quarter.

Antonio Daniels hit a 3-pointer just before the first-quarter buzzer, and San Antonio began the second quarter with a 19-10 run to pull within two, 42-40, on a drive by Elliott on which it appeared he traveled.

New York led 49-46 at halftime behind 18 points from Houston, 12 from Sprewell and 10 from Johnson. Robinson had 14 and Duncan 12 for the Spurs.

Camby went to the bench w fouls early in the third quarte ing a chair as he arrived at th still scoreless, but Houston h of jumpers and a pull-up 3-po the fast break - all in a span c for a personal 7-0 run that p York ahead 56-47.

The Knicks then missed th 11 shots and allowed Duncan at 58 with 3:31 left in the third

Houston then hit a 3-poin made two free throws with 1 to reach 30 points, and Ne took a 65-62 lead into the four

Dallas celebrates the Cup

Associated Press

DALLAS — With a tug of his pant legs, Dallas Stars owner Tom Hicks showed off the perfect symbol of a Texas team winning the Stanley Cup: black boots with the shiny silver trophy emblazoned on each shin.

Forward Dave Reid added to the image by wearing a black cowboy hat throughout a downtown parade Monday and a Reunion Arena pep rally in honor of the NHL champions.

More than 75,000 people lined the streets for the parade. They saw the players ride by on four floats, the final one carrying the Cup.

"For them to see a team other than the Cowboys win something is fun," forward Guy Carbonneau said.

Truth is, Dallas fans have loved the Stars ever since they moved from Minnesota in 1993.

"You've been here with us for six years," captain Derian Hatcher, one of three remaining Minnesota North Stars, told the Reunion Arena crowd. "Now we have (the Cup) here and it looks good here. Hopefully, we can build a nice little house for it."

The Stars won the first title in their 32-year history and the first for a team in the Sun Belt early Sunday with a 2-1 triple-overtime victory over the Buffalo Sabres in Game 6. Although a controversy is brewing over the Cup-winning goal scored by Brett Hull while his left foot was in the goalie's crease, there were no references to it Monday.

After a 45-minute parade from City Hall to Reunion Arena, the players were introduced, each walking through a giant star-shaped metal structure.

The last player out was Hatcher, who ushered in the Cup beneath a shower of fireworks and a burning, revolving star. He placed the trophy on a five-foot pedestal in the center of the stage.

Each player got a turn hoisting the Cup and most of them kissed the trophy, Mike Modano doing so several times.

Starzz' Layden stuns, steps down as coach

NewsNet Services

After stating less than two weeks ago that coaching the Utah Starzz had rejuvenated him, Frank Layden stunned fans Monday by resigning as head coach of the team. Citing a lack of time and the grueling travel and 14-hour days, Layden said he was getting tired and wants to spend more time with his family.

Assistant coach Fred Williams will take over as the Starzz' new head man.

Layden became the Starzz coach when he replaced Denise Taylor in July 1998. He finished the season with two wins, and the team had an overall record of 8-22.

After opening this season with a home win against Orlando, the Starzz were hammered in Minnesota and Houston, losing by 24 and 20 points, respectively.

The Starzz picked up their second win of the season last Saturday, beating Sacramento by ten.

"It gets old," said Layden. "I was getting tired. Time is a precious commodity right now."

Layden is a former Utah Jazz coach who led that team to the playoffs five consecutive seasons and won the NBA coach of the Year award in 1984. He will remain president of the Jazz — the Starzz' big brothers.

He said he thinks he has done all he can for the Starzz, and feels it is time to let another coach take charge.

Fred Williams joined the Starzz in 1998 as the top assistant. His previous coaching experience came from the collegiate level, most recently at USC. Williams was an assistant to Cheryl Miller at USC and helped the team win the 1984 NCAA Championship.

"I think it's a great opportunity for me ... for the baton to be passed from Frank Layden who is a great legend of a coach," Williams said. "I think a lot of good things are happening."

The Starzz return to action Thursday when they travel to Sacramento to face the Monarchs for the second time in five days.

uzz' Ortiz awakens bat for Saturday slugfest

By BETH PALMER
elizabeth@du2.byu.edu

you play baseball for a living, ve to remember that — above — you play the game because .

ast, that philosophy seems to king for Buzz first baseman Ortiz.

going 0-3 Thursday during the 9-7 loss in the opening game Lake's four-game series with coma Rainiers at Franklin Field — a game that was the of a 10-game stretch that saw just .263 with four RBIs — was benched for a game by anager Phil Roof.

then took the 23-year-old er aside early Saturday for xtra batting practice and a few words of advice.

"He's been struggling," Roof said. "He got in a mind-set that no luck was coming his way ... I told him you create your own luck by the attitude you bring."

The chat seemed to hit home for Ortiz.

With an attitude that had to please his manager, Ortiz led the Buzz to a 7-2 win over the Rainiers on Saturday night with a 3-4 performance that included four RBIs and two home runs — one being a monster shot that easily cleared the picnickers on the berm in right field.

"I was thinking about the way I used to hit," Ortiz said. "I used to have a lot of fun playing the game — coming to the field, watching everybody, don't be getting mad."

But over the past couple of weeks that logic seemed to be escaping Ortiz. His recent slump was only worsened by the burden he was placing on his own shoulders.

"I wanna do the best I can," he said. "Maybe the reason I was putting so much pressure on myself was because I was trying to do everything better than I normally do ... (when you do that) everything comes up backwards."

Ortiz's return to form over the weekend, including a 3-5 stint in Salt Lake's 10-3 win Sunday, helped the Buzz to a 3-1 series win over Tacoma. The team has won its last three series and nine of its last 12 games. Roof said his first baseman's showing Saturday was the reappearance of the real Ortiz.

"This is what he's capable of doing," he said. "He's strong. He can hit the ball a long way and he hits good pitching. He needs to direct his thoughts and energy."

But for a man who spent the bulk of last season with the major-league Minnesota Twins, keeping his thoughts in Triple-A isn't the easiest thing to do.

"He's gotta hit," Roof said. "He's gotta produce to help us win and get himself back to the big leagues."

And while Ortiz's ultimate goal is to make it back to the Twin Cities, as long as he's wearing a Buzz uniform he'll keep working on that philosophy — a big part of which will include placing less pressure on himself.

"We have a lot of pretty good hitters on our team," Ortiz said. "They're gonna have to face me or face them ... I was getting mad when I got a walk. (Pitchers) ain't gonna come to me. They're gonna mess around a little bit. I just have to go to home plate and hit my pitch."

rt became only the 13th play- n the U.S. Open at least twice. It also was his third major championship — he won the 1989 PGA Championship and the 1991 U.S. Open. That's one more than Greg Norman, and just as many as Hale Irwin and Nick Price.

"Where it puts me in the golf world is I'm a pretty good and accomplished player," Stewart said. "Nobody can ever take that away from me, no matter what's been written about me."

Lately, what had been written about Stewart had to do with failure.

Never mind that he won the 1991 U.S. Open at Hazeltine by making up two strokes over the last three holes against Scott Simpson, first to get into a playoff, then to win the next day. He failed to put enough pressure on an inexperienced Lee Janzen in 1993. He blew a four-stroke lead against Janzen last year at Olympic Club.

No other player in the history of the U.S. Open — not Hogan, not Bobby Jones, not Jack Nicklaus — had led after any of the first three rounds as much as Stewart. All he had to show for it was one U.S. Open title.

His only victories since then were the Houston Open in 1995 — where Scott Hoch virtually handed him the tournament — and in February at Pebble Beach, where the tournament was called after 54 holes because of rain.

Stewart said then that he wanted to prove he could win over 72 holes. No one can question that now, and Stewart for once doesn't have to answer to anybody.

"What happened last year at the U.S. Open ... all my friends came up and said, 'Boy, you sure tried. It was a great effort. You're a great competitor,'" Stewart said. "I didn't want to hear that, and that motivated me."

After the tournament, Stewart sounded a lot like Nicklaus did before it began.

Nicklaus recalled his first chance to win a U.S. Open. He had a one-stroke lead in the final round at Cherry Hills until he three-putted the next two greens, missed two birdie putts and watched Arnold Palmer charge from behind to win the 1960 U.S. Open.

"Every time you lose, you learn something," Nicklaus said.

Those are words with which Stewart can identify.

U.S. wins World Cup opener 3-0 over Denmark in Big Apple

Associated Press

Trotting around the Giants Stadium field, saluting the largest crowd to see a women's sporting event in this country, the U.S. soccer team was missing someone: Mia Hamm.

No big deal. Having Hamm in the lineup is much more crucial than having her around for celebrations like the one that followed a 3-0 victory over Denmark in the Women's World Cup opener Saturday.

Hamm did wave to the record gathering of 78,972. She clapped her hands above her head in tribute. But she also headed quickly to the locker room after both her calves cramped late in the game.

The subsequent victory lap was one of the few things the Americans did well without their star striker, who scored once and set up another goal.

"There will be games where my team needs someone to light a fire," Hamm said. "Maybe it will be me, or Kristine (Lilly) or Julie (Foudy). That's what is great about this team. I wouldn't be the player I am without this team. They are the ones who make players like me."

Perhaps. Lilly and Foudy did score, after all. But they didn't set the tone against the Danes. Hamm, the sport's career goal-scoring leader, did.

"Up until the first goal, we really weren't playing our game," said Cindy Parlow, one of the main culprits in not converting her opportunities Saturday. "We were playing a lot of defense, and they were getting in (threatening position). And then we get one chance, and Mia puts it away. That's a veteran player for you.

"She settled everyone down. She scored the important goal. I think that did a lot for us. It relaxed us all. It was like, `OK, we can do this.'"

What they want to do next is beat Nigeria in Chicago on Thursday night. That would clinch a spot in the quarterfinals — and a place in the 2000 Olympics, as well.

First, though, they're entitled to look back at the opener, which they hope was a harbinger for the tournament and women's soccer in general.

"It was just a very, very proud moment for us and for our sport," Hamm said of playing before the largest crowd for a sports event at Giants Stadium. "We still have a long way to go to win the Cup, and it's not going to be easy, but what a great first day."

the project was approved, neering department recom- nat the driveway from Plum uld not connect onto 2230 North," he said.

However, Secrist said the commission did not follow the recommendation, and the project was approved.

"This is an example of why there are so many reviews and staff reviews. It helps prevent problems and gets everyone on the same page," Secrist said.

But developer Preston Peterson said all of the reviews his proposal went through did him no good at all.

Peterson said he and some local West Mountain land owners presented the county commissioners with a proposal to incorporate some land west of Payson for development. Peterson said he had plans to subdivide his land and build houses, something he can not do in an unincorporated area. But the County denied the proposal.

"We were met with a lot of opposition from West Mountain residents who didn't understand the proposal," Peterson said.

Buck Rose, a Utah County Planner, said the West Mountain proposal was a controversial issue. Rose said the proposal was denied because the County felt like incorporation issues, such as basic town survival and ability to provide the necessary services, had not been resolved.

Another Utah County Planner Natalie Marler said many issues are considered before a development in the County can be approved. Marler said approval involves such things as environmental hazards and water and sewage issues.

However, Peterson thinks the opposition from local residents swayed the County's decision.

Secrist admits special interest groups can influence the planning commission. In fact, Secrist said one such group changed the minds of the planning commission when the 2300 North and Plum Tree intersection was approved against the better judgement of the engineers.

Warren said one of his earlier proposed developments was controversial for one particular special interest group - Geneva Steel.

"It just so happened one of the planning commissioners was heavily affiliated with Geneva Steel at the time our proposal was denied. It kind of makes you wonder about the political process and what the real reasons are behind some decisions," Warren said.

Secrist said hiring a professional architect to make a large scale plan of Provo City could help with some of its development problems.

Officials: Beware of charity scams

By ETHAN SCOTT
escott@du2.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

Relief agencies helping the needy are always looking for donations, and scam artists are quick to mingle and bilk generous donators.

Disasters like the conflict in Kosovo and the tornadoes in Oklahoma seem to bring fraudulent charities out of the woodwork, said Francine Giani, director of the Utah Division of Consumer Protection.

"It happens virtually anytime there is a high visibility disaster of any kind," she said. "As public attention is raised, it becomes that much easier to try to scam someone."

When refugees started pouring out of Kosovo, concerns about fraudulent charities led the Utah Division of Consumer Protection to issue a preemptive press release warning about relief aid scams.

It was just a matter of time before someone decided to try to make a profit from the situation, Giani said.

The Division of Consumer Protection registers charities that conduct fundraisers in Utah and investigates cases of fraud.

"There are lots of scam charities out there," Giani said. "When we uncover one we pursue them vigorously."

Careful donations can cut down the number of cases of fraud, Giani said.

"Consumers need to take some responsibility, too," she said. "Consumers need to ask questions."

In addition to asking questions about how donations are used, people should ask whether a charity is registered with the Division of Consumer Protection and ask for written information about the charity, Giani said.

People should also be wary of any individual that pressures them to give cash or credit card numbers, she said.

Giani counsels Utahns to decide at the beginning of the year how many charities they will donate to.

"People need to make those decisions before they get the high pressure sales tactic," she said.

People should also realize that donating to one charity will often lead to contacts from other charities, Giani said.

"People need to understand that charities sell your name," she said. "You give to one charity and you get contacted by 10 more."

People looking to donate money to disaster relief organizations should ask a couple of questions before they give money, said Russ Behrmann, president and CEO of the Better Business Bureau of Utah.

"Most good established charities have good established boards," Behrmann said.

Members of the board should be mostly unpaid volunteers, Behrmann said. Too many paid board members is a bad sign. Paid board members shouldn't constitute more than 20 percent of the board.

"What percentage of my money will go to the cause?"

"If they're spending all of their money raising money, the water isn't getting to the end of the row," Behrmann said.

To get the approval of the Better Business Bureau, charities must use at least 50 percent of donations to the cause. No more than 35 percent of donations should be used to gather more money, Behrmann said.

When being approached for a donation, people should pay attention to how the solicitor is trying to get their money.

"Anytime you feel they are using over dramatic or melodramatic actions people must question why," Behrmann said.

People should also be aware of solicitors who are using aggressive sales tactics.

"We are very concerned if they use excessive pressure in their fundraising," Behrmann said.

Multiple calls, calls at odd hours or strong-arm tactics are all reasons to avoid making a donation.

A good rule of thumb is to donate to an established, well-known charity, Behrmann said. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has used established charities to send goods to needy places for years.

Anyone who has a question about a relief organization should contact the Better Business Bureau for more information, Behrmann said.

"It would be amazing to see what would happen if all the money would be sent to the right place," Behrmann said.

According to a survey sponsored by American Association of Retired Persons, over 80 percent of people gave at least one donation in response to a contact over the phone or by mail. Fifty-seven percent of those who donated never asked how their money would be used.

Kristen Ball, state representative for AARP, said that people must find out how that money will be spent before they donate.

"Some charities may only give 5 percent and 95 percent may be going to administrative costs," she said.

Ball also suggests that an annual plan helps in avoiding fraud.

"I recommend they have an annual giving plan. Those with giving plans are less likely to overspend or donate to fraudulent charities," she said.

Police find it difficult to prevent DUIs

By CINDY HARTLEY
cindy@du2.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

Each year alcohol-related traffic accidents cost Utah over $1.3 billion in health care and jail costs, according to Gov. Mike Leavitt's office, but law enforcement officers said there is not a lot they can do to keep drunk drivers off the roads.

Under federal regulations, a person caught driving with a blood alcohol content of .08 is issued a class B misdemeanor DUI citation, which means 'driving under the influence' of alcohol.

Lt. Fernstedt of the Utah County Sheriff's office said he often issues DUIs to the same people over and over. Fernstedt said repeat offenders are the "name of the game."

"You get to the point that you recognize certain cars, or you get to know the actual drivers of the cars," Fernstedt said.

Attorney Roy Montclair said the punishment for a DUI is an approximate $1,500 fine, driver's license suspension for 120 days, and two days in jail.

Fernstedt said people that lose their licenses still need to get around, so they just drive with suspended licenses and hope they don't get caught.

"The only way to keep offenders off the road is to lock them up," he said.

But two days in jail doesn't lock a criminal up for long, and Montclair also said that most DUI offenders he sees end up driving on suspended licenses because they have jobs and other places to get to.

Montclair said an officer cannot pull someone over without probable cause, so it's hard to catch a multiple DUI offender on the street if the driver is not breaking any laws.

A member of the Utah Alcohol Policy Coalition said part of the problem is that society is sympathetic to drunk drivers. State Rep. Nora Stephens, R-Davis, has formed a mini-task force to deal with alcohol-related issues.

Stephens said one of the weak links in the systems is what happens in the courts after someone has been arrested for a DUI. She said a person convicted of driving under the influence is tried by either judge or jury, and it is unusual for judges or jury members not to have close friends or relatives that have been in similar situations.

Stephens also said arbiters tend to sympathize with the criminals because they don't want to stigmatize them or cause undue embarrassment to their families. About 80 percent of DUI offenders are social drinkers without serious addictions, she said.

The biggest misconception most judges and jury members have is that drinkers are not impaired unless they are falling down drunk, Stephens said.

But according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the probability for a car crash increases significantly at .05 BAC, and even more rapidly at the legal .08 BAC.

Often DUI charges can be plea-bargained in the courts, a practice that has become a sort of art-form for some attorneys, Stephens said.

Montclair said lawyers know several loopholes they can use to reduce DUI fines or misdemeanor charges, and some attorneys specialize in that.

One of those loopholes was plugged in the legislative session last winter, said Ben Christensen, a legislative research analyst.

Intoxicated drivers were previously getting away with drinking and driving by consuming large alcoholic quantities right before they drove home. Then if they were pulled over, the alcohol had not yet sunk into their blood, and they could pass sobriety tests, Christensen said.

Stephens passed House bill 346, which no longer allows drinkers to get away with that practice. But she said she also recognizes that other alcohol-related problems still exist. For the past few years, she has introduced new legislation to help keep repeat offenders with suspended licenses off the roads.

One option Stephens has created for judges is to require convicted drunk drivers to use an ignition interlocking device to start their cars, she said. The driver has to blow into the device, which measures the blood alcohol level, and if it is above .08, the car won't start. In the past these devices have not been effective, because people could get others to breathe into the ignition for them, or use balloons to blow air into them, Stephens said.

But advanced technology is improving the devices, and Stephens said the state has arranged a provider in Denver willing to install the bettered systems in the vehicles of Utah offenders; a practice that has previously not been cost-effective for the technology companies.

Stephens said judges also have the option of requiring electronic monitoring systems that allow the courts to verify repeat offenders have not been drinking, and still let them drive to and from work. The offenders would wear an ankle bracelet and be required to periodically check-in with courts for blood testing, in exchange for not losing their licenses or serving time in jail.

This is a good alternative punishment, because often jails are so crowded they don't have room for DUI offenders to even be held while they sober up, Stephens said.

Setting-up special drug-court systems or offering treatment to repeat offenders are other possible drunk-driving solutions suggested by a sociologist who deals with cultural drinking problems.

Richard Johnson, associate professor of sociology, said a lot of repeat offenders don't intentionally break the law, but do need help breaking their alcohol addictions. He said offering treatment as part of the corrections process should at least be available to offenders, and is cheaper than putting them in jail.
